“It was so much nicer for the students to be able to hold and examine the artifacts. The little oil can had a smell, which would have been completely lost if they were looking at pictures. Details are more apparent in a real object vs. pictures.

It was more meaningful for the students to hold something ‘old.’ ”

“The students created five pieces of writing over the course of the week.

During a poll at the end of the week, all of the students said their writing had improved. They thought their sentences structures were better, that the mechanics of their writing was better, and that they were expressing themselves better.”
