Speaker 1: Our roots run deep through West Central Alberta because it's been such a big part of Chevron Canada's history. We began exploring the region in the 1950s, and a decade later, discovered the largest wet-gas reservoir in Canada. The discovery of the Kaybob South Field led Chevron to build the largest sour gas plant in the world near the fledgling community of Fox Creek. In support of the project, we built a bridge across the Athabasca River, 60 homes, and an apartment complex. But the real story is about our people who helped build a strong sense of community in and around Fox Creek.

Jeff Lehrmann: The reason the community is so important to us is because the men and women of Chevron, we live in the communities in which we work. These are the places that we raise our children, and so our legacy is that we are a respected and a reliable neighbor in each community that we work.

Jim Navratil: Since I started with Chevron as a facilities engineer at the Kaybob South Gas Plant in 1992, it's going home really.

Speaker 1: Today we are evaluating the commercial viability of 330,000 acres with our partner KUFPEC Canada Incorporated.

Jeff Lehrmann: Our vision is clearly on the horizon.

Speaker 1: That vision requires an unrelenting commitment to safety, environmental protection, innovation, and building on relationships. We're doing this now by helping First Nation youth develop self esteem through Tatanka Workshops, supporting healthy communities through contributions to the Nordic Trail, and we will continue investing in communities as our operations grow.

Brad Caldwell: My job is to ensure that local and First Nations communities in the areas that we're operating in have economic opportunities. So we're looking for local companies that are competitive, that meet the industry standards, and Chevron standards around health and safety.

Greg Hild: I think the universal policy for being a good neighbor is you treat others the way you'd like to be treated.

Speaker 1: That principle has guided Chevron Canada for more than 77 years, and will continue long into the future.

Jeff Lehrmann: We will distinguish ourselves by the people that we have, the way we perform, the partnerships that we build with our business partners, First Nations communities, and delivering incident free operations and a affordable, reliable energy source.
